Insulation is a very important factor in the comfort, efficiency and acoustics of any house or building. For people who want to enjoy their music without disturbing the neighbors or have a theatre room to enjoy special movies and sound effects it is imperative that the walls and floors are insulated adequately to keep the sound in with the proper balance.

Ideally it should be installed during the construction phase of a home to be the most effective, however you can still improve the noise level in an existing home. The best time to install it is if you are replacing the carpet, other flooring or need to repair the flooring in a specific room. Many home improvement projects will yield better results if some updating in what is not seen is done at the same time as the cosmetic updates. Floor sound insulation is one such example.

Why Adding floor insulation is a good idea

As a house ages, the creaks and noises seem to increase. By adding floor insulation you are giving the floors more stability that will not only reduce the amount of noise seeping from the rooms above, but will help quiet squeaky floors that have had their screws come a little loose over the years or whose boards may have warped a bit.

Consider soundproofing an investment in your house. The value will be increased as you improve the quality of noise control with sound insulation.
